The nature of our relationships has changed significantly. Calling or actually meeting people is replaced by texting and escaping into virtual worlds. Platforms such as Facebook and text messaging apps enable us to engage with people without actually seeing them. When we connect digitally, even though we feel like we are together with others, we are actually alone most of the time.

Who should read this book:

- People who want to know more about how emotional relationships with objects are formed.
- Anyone interested in finding out more about robots and their therapeutic use.
- Anyone who wants to get deeper insights into the areas of science and technology.

In this summary:

Chapter 1: More and more people favor technology over real life

Chapter 2: Even though we know machines are not alive, we still get attached to them

Chapter 3: Robots could be used to take care of elderly people

Chapter 4: Replacing humans with robots is often the easiest choice

Chapter 5: Machines may appear to understand us, but they don't have real emotions

Chapter 6: How we connect with others has changed significantly

Chapter 7: Texting gives us more time to prepare what we want to say

Chapter 8: We are always reachable and would feel isolated without our devices

Chapter 9: Sharing something on the Internet feels more secure, but it is not

Chapter 10: Online connections are only effective in keeping us busy

Chapter 11: Final Summary
